

MEMORANDUM

DATE: May 14, 2004

TO: Judge David F. Levi, Chair
Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure

FROM: Judge Samuel A. Alito, Jr., Chair
Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules

RE: Report of Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules

I. Introduction

The Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules met on April 13 and 14, 2004, in Washington, D.C. The Committee approved all of the proposed amendments that had been published for comment in August 2003, including the controversial rule regarding the citation of unpublished opinions. The Committee also removed three items from the Committee's study agenda, tentatively approved one item for publication, and, at the request of the E-Government Subcommittee, discussed a draft rule intended to protect private information in court filings.

Detailed information about the Advisory Committee's activities can be found in the minutes of the April meeting and in the Committee's study agenda, both of which are attached to this report.

II. Action Items

Several proposed amendments to the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure ("FRAP") were published for comment in August 2003.

The comments received by the Advisory Committee were unusual in several respects. First, we received an extraordinarily large number of comments: 513 written comments were submitted, and 15 witnesses testified at a public hearing on April 13. By contrast, a much more extensive set of proposed amendments published in August 2000 attracted 20 written comments and no requests to testify. Second, the overwhelming majority of the comments — about 95 percent — pertained only to proposed Rule 32.1 (regarding the citing of unpublished opinions). Third, most of the comments on Rule 32.1 came from one circuit. About 75 percent of all comments (pro and con) regarding Rule 32.1 — and about 80 percent of the comments opposing Rule 32.1 — came from judges, clerks, lawyers, and others who work or formerly worked in the Ninth Circuit. Fourth, the vast majority of the comments on Rule 32.1 — about 90 percent — opposed adopting the rule. Finally, the comments regarding Rule 32.1 were extremely repetitive. Many repeated — word-for-word — the same basic “talking points” distributed by opponents of the rule, and many letters were identical or nearly identical copies of each other.

Because of the unusual nature of the public comments, I will report on them somewhat differently than we have reported on public comments in the past. With respect to every proposed rule except Rule 32.1, I will provide the following: (1) a brief introduction; (2) the text of the proposed amendment and Committee Note, as approved by the Committee; (3) a description of the changes made after publication and comments; and (4) a summary of each of the public comments. With respect to proposed Rule 32.1, I will provide the same information, except that I will not individually summarize each of the 513 written comments and each of the 15 statements given at the public hearing. Instead, I will summarize the major arguments made for and against adopting Rule 32.1, and then I will identify all those who supported or opposed the rule.

As I noted, the Advisory Committee approved all of the proposed amendments for submission to the Standing Committee. Modifications were made to most of the proposed amendments and Committee Notes, but, in the Committee’s view, none of the modifications is substantial enough to require republication.

E. New Rule 32.1

1. Introduction

The Committee proposes to add a new Rule 32.1 that will require courts to permit the citation of judicial opinions, orders, judgments, or other written dispositions that have been designated as “unpublished,” “non-precedential,” or the like. New Rule 32.1 will also require parties who cite “unpublished” or “non-precedential” opinions that are not available in a publicly accessible electronic database (such as Westlaw) to provide copies of those opinions to the court and to the other parties.

2. Text of Proposed Amendment and Committee Note

Rule 32.1. Citing Judicial Dispositions

- 1 (a) Citation Permitted. A court may not prohibit or restrict 2 the citation of judicial opinions, orders, judgments, or 3 other written dispositions that have been designated as 4 “unpublished,” “not for publication,” “non-precedential,” 5 “not precedent,” or the like.
- 6 (b) Copies Required. If a party cites a judicial opinion, 7 order, judgment, or other written disposition that is not 8 available in a publicly accessible electronic database, the 9 party must file and serve a copy of that opinion, order,

10 judgment, or disposition with the brief or other paper in 11 which it is cited.

Committee Note

Rule 32.1 is a new rule addressing the citation of judicial opinions, orders, judgments, or other written dispositions that have been designated as “unpublished,” “not for publication,” “non-precedential,” “not precedent,” or the like. This Note will refer to these dispositions collectively as “unpublished” opinions. This is a term of art that, while not always literally true (as many “unpublished” opinions are in fact published), is commonly understood to refer to the entire group of judicial dispositions addressed by Rule 32.1.

The citation of unpublished opinions is an important issue. The thirteen courts of appeals have cumulatively issued tens of thousands of unpublished opinions, and about 80% of the opinions issued by the courts of appeals in recent years have been designated as unpublished. Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Judicial Business of the United States Courts 2001, tbl. S-3 (2001). Although the courts of appeals differ somewhat in their treatment of unpublished opinions, most agree that an unpublished opinion of a circuit does not bind panels of that circuit or district courts within that circuit (or any other court).

Rule 32.1 is extremely limited. It takes no position on whether refusing to treat an unpublished opinion as binding precedent is constitutional. Compare Hart v. Massanari, 266 F.3d 1155, 1159-80 (9th Cir. 2001), with Anastasoff v. U.S., 223 F.3d 898, 899-905, vacated as moot on reh’g en banc 235 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2000). It does not require any court to issue an unpublished opinion or forbid any court from doing so. It does not dictate the circumstances under which a court may choose to designate an opinion as unpublished or specify the procedure that a court must follow in making that decision. It says nothing about what effect a court must give to one of its unpublished opinions or to the unpublished opinions of another court. Rule 32.1 addresses only the citation of judicial dispositions that have been designated as “unpublished” or “non-precedential” by a federal or state court — whether or not those dispositions have been published in some way or are precedential in some sense.

Subdivision (a). Every court of appeals has allowed unpublished opinions to be cited in some circumstances, such as to support a claim of claim preclusion, issue preclusion, law of the case, double jeopardy, sanctionable conduct, abuse of the writ, notice, or entitlement to attorney’s fees. Not all of the circuits have specifically mentioned all of these claims in their local rules, but it does not appear that any circuit has ever sanctioned an attorney for citing an unpublished opinion under these circumstances.

By contrast, the circuits have differed dramatically with respect to the restrictions that they have placed on the citation of unpublished opinions for their persuasive value. An opinion cited for its “persuasive value” is cited not because it is binding on the court or because it is relevant under a doctrine such as claim preclusion. Rather, it is cited because a party hopes that it will influence the court as, say, the opinion of another court of appeals or a district court might. Some circuits have freely permitted the citation of unpublished opinions for their persuasive value, some circuits have disfavored such citation but permitted it in limited circumstances, and some circuits have not permitted such citation under any circumstances.

Parties seek to cite unpublished opinions in another context in which parties do not argue that the opinions bind the court to reach a particular result. Frequently, parties will seek to bolster an argument by pointing to the presence or absence of a substantial number of unpublished opinions on a particular issue or by pointing to the consistency or inconsistency of those unpublished opinions. Most no-citation rules do not clearly address the citation of unpublished opinions in this context.

Rule 32.1(a) is intended to replace these inconsistent and unclear standards with one uniform rule. Under Rule 32.1(a), a court of appeals may not prohibit a party from citing an unpublished opinion of a federal or state court for its persuasive value or for any other reason. In addition, under Rule 32.1(a), a court may not place any restriction on the citation of unpublished opinions. For example, a court may not instruct parties that the citation of unpublished opinions is disfavored, nor may a court forbid parties to cite unpublished opinions when a published opinion addresses the same issue.

Rules prohibiting or restricting the citation of unpublished opinions — rules that forbid a party from calling a court’s attention to the court’s own official actions — are inconsistent with basic principles underlying the rule of law. In a common law system, the presumption is that a court’s official actions may be cited to the court, and that parties are free to argue that the court should or should not act consistently with its prior actions. In an adversary system, the presumption is that lawyers are free to use their professional judgment in making the best arguments available on behalf of their clients. A prior restraint on what a party may tell a court about the court’s own rulings may also raise First Amendment concerns. But whether or not no-citation rules are constitutional — a question on which neither Rule 32.1 nor this Note takes any position — they cannot be justified as a policy matter.

No-citation rules were originally justified on the grounds that, without them, large institutional litigants who could afford to collect and organize unpublished opinions would have an unfair advantage. Whatever force this argument may once have had, that force has been greatly diminished by the widespread availability of unpublished opinions on Westlaw and Lexis, on free Internet sites, and now in the Federal Appendix. In almost all of the circuits, unpublished opinions are as readily available as “published” opinions, and soon every court of appeals will be required to post all of its decisions — including unpublished decisions — on its website “in a text searchable format.” See E-Government Act of 2002, Pub. L. 107-347, § 205(a)(5), 116 Stat. 2899, 2913. Barring citation to unpublished opinions is no longer necessary to level the playing field.

As the original justification for no-citation rules has eroded, many new justifications have been offered in its place. Three of the most prominent deserve mention:

1. First, defenders of no-citation rules argue that there is nothing of value in unpublished opinions. These opinions, they argue, merely inform the parties and the lower court of why the court of appeals concluded that the lower court did or did not err. Unpublished opinions do not establish a new rule of law; expand, narrow, or clarify an existing rule of law; apply an existing rule of law to facts that are significantly different from the facts presented in published opinions; create or resolve a conflict in the law; or address a legal issue in which the public has a significant interest. For these reasons, no-citation rules do not deprive the courts or parties of anything of value.

This argument is not persuasive. As an initial matter, one might wonder why no-citation rules are necessary if all unpublished opinions are truly valueless. Presumably parties will not often seek to cite or even to read worthless opinions. The fact is, though, that unpublished opinions are widely read, often cited by attorneys (even in circuits that forbid such citation), and occasionally relied upon by judges (again, even in circuits that have imposed no-citation rules). See, e.g., Harris v. United Fed'n of Teachers, No. 02-Civ. 3257 (GEL), 2002 WL 1880391, at *1 n.2 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 14, 2002). Unpublished opinions are often read and cited precisely because they can contain valuable information or insights. When attorneys can and do read unpublished opinions — and when judges can and do get influenced by unpublished opinions — it only makes sense to permit attorneys and judges to talk with each other about unpublished opinions.

Without question, unpublished opinions have substantial limitations. But those limitations are best known to the judges who draft unpublished opinions. Appellate judges do not need no-citation rules to protect themselves from being misled by the shortcomings of their own opinions. Likewise, trial judges who must regularly grapple with the most complicated legal and factual issues imaginable are quite capable of understanding and respecting the limitations of unpublished opinions.

2. Second, defenders of no-citation rules argue that unpublished opinions are necessary for busy courts because they take much less time to draft than published opinions. Knowing that published opinions will bind future panels and lower courts, judges draft them with painstaking care. Judges do not spend as much time on drafting unpublished opinions, because judges know that such opinions function only as explanations to those involved in the cases. If unpublished opinions could be cited, the argument goes, judges would respond by issuing many more one-line judgments that provide no explanation or by putting much more time into drafting unpublished decisions (or both). Both practices would harm the justice system.

The short answer to this argument is that numerous federal and state courts have abolished or liberalized no-citation rules, and there is no evidence that any court has experienced any of these consequences. It is, of course, true that every court is different. But the federal courts of appeals are enough alike, and have enough in common with state supreme courts, that there should be some evidence that permitting citation of unpublished opinions results in, say, opinions being issued more slowly. No such evidence exists, though.

3. Finally, defenders of no-citation rules argue that abolishing no-citation rules will increase the costs of legal representation in at least two ways. First, it will vastly increase the size of the body of case law that will have to be researched by attorneys before advising or representing clients. Second, it will make the body of case law more difficult to understand. Because little effort goes into drafting unpublished opinions, and because unpublished opinions often say little about the facts, unpublished opinions will introduce into the corpus of the law thousands of ambiguous, imprecise, and misleading statements that will be represented as the “holdings” of a circuit. These burdens will harm all litigants, but particularly pro se litigants, prisoners, the poor, and the middle class.

The short answer to this argument is the same as the short answer to the argument about the impact on judicial workloads: Over the past few years, numerous federal and state courts have abolished or liberalized no-citation rules, and there is no evidence that attorneys and litigants have experienced these consequences.

The dearth of evidence of harmful consequences is unsurprising, for it is not the ability to cite unpublished opinions that triggers a duty to research them, but rather the likelihood that reviewing unpublished opinions will help an attorney in advising or representing a client. In researching unpublished opinions, attorneys already apply and will continue to apply the same common sense that they apply in researching everything else. No attorney conducts research by reading every case, treatise, law review article, and other writing in existence on a particular point — and no attorney will conduct research that way if unpublished opinions can be cited. If a point is well-covered by published opinions, an attorney may not read unpublished opinions at all. But if a point is not addressed in any published opinion, an attorney may look at unpublished opinions, as he or she probably should.

The disparity between litigants who are wealthy and those who are not is an unfortunate reality. Undoubtedly, some litigants have better access to unpublished opinions, just as some litigants have better access to published opinions, statutes, law review articles — or, for that matter, lawyers. The solution to these disparities is not to forbid all parties from citing unpublished opinions. After all, parties are not forbidden from citing published opinions, statutes, or law review articles — or from retaining lawyers. Rather, the solution is found in measures such as the E-Government Act, which make unpublished opinions widely available at little or no cost.

In sum, whether or not no-citation rules were ever justifiable as a policy matter, they are no longer justifiable today. To the contrary, they tend to undermine public confidence in the judicial system by leading some litigants — who have difficulty comprehending why they cannot tell a court that it has addressed the same issue in the past — to suspect that unpublished opinions are being used for improper purposes. They require attorneys to pick through the inconsistent formal no-citation rules and informal practices of the circuits in which they appear and risk being sanctioned or accused of unethical conduct if they make a mistake. And they forbid attorneys from bringing to the court's attention information that might help their client's cause.

Because no-citation rules harm the administration of justice, Rule 32.1 abolishes such rules and requires courts to permit unpublished opinions to be cited.

Subdivision (b). Under Rule 32.1(b), a party who cites an opinion must provide a copy of that opinion to the court and to the other parties, unless that opinion is available in a publicly accessible electronic database — such as in Westlaw or on a court’s website. A party who is required under Rule 32.1(b) to provide a copy of an opinion must file and serve the copy with the brief or other paper in which the opinion is cited.

It should be noted that, under Rule 32.1(a), a court of appeals may not require parties to file or serve copies of all of the unpublished opinions cited in their briefs or other papers. Unpublished opinions are widely available on free websites (such as those maintained by federal and state courts), on commercial websites (such as those maintained by Westlaw and Lexis), and even in published compilations (such as the Federal Appendix). Given the widespread availability of unpublished opinions, requiring parties to file and serve copies of every unpublished opinion that they cite is unnecessary and burdensome and is an example of a restriction forbidden by Rule 32.1(a).

3. Changes Made After Publication and Comments

No changes were made to the text of subdivision (b) or to the accompanying Committee Note.

The text of subdivision (a) was changed. The proposed rule, as published, provided that a prohibition or restriction could not be placed upon the citation of unpublished opinions “unless that prohibition or restriction is generally imposed upon the citation of all judicial opinions, orders, judgments, or other written dispositions.” The Committee was trying to accomplish two goals by drafting the rule in this manner: On the one hand, the Committee did not want a court to be able to permit the citation of unpublished opinions as a formal matter, but then, as a practical matter, make such citation nearly impossible by imposing various restrictions on it. On the other hand, the Committee did not want to preclude circuits from imposing general requirements of form or style upon the citation of all authorities.

After reflecting on the comments — particularly those of Judge Easterbrook — the Committee concluded that this clause was unnecessary. First, as Judge Easterbrook pointed out, Rule 32(e) was intended to put the circuits out of the business of imposing general requirements of form or style. It is hard to identify a requirement of form or style that could be both endangered by Rule 32.1 and enforced under Rule 32(e). Second, Rule 32.1 is most naturally read as precluding only prohibitions and restrictions on the Rule 32(e) provides: “Every court of appeals must accept documents that comply with the form requirements of this rule. By local rule or order in a particular case a court of appeals may accept documents that do not meet all of the form requirements of this rule.”

citation of unpublished opinions as such — that is, prohibitions and restrictions aimed exclusively at the citation of unpublished opinions. A page limit on a brief could be said indirectly to “restrict” the citation of unpublished opinions, but no one is likely to read Rule 32.1 to forbid page limits on briefs.

For these reasons, the “generally imposed” clause was removed, leaving the rule simply to forbid courts from prohibiting or restricting the citation of unpublished opinions. What remained of the subdivision was also restyled so that it is now stated in the active rather than passive voice. The published version of the rule had been written passively — contrary to style conventions — because some Committee members hoped that a passively written rule would be less controversial. That strategy did not work, and all Committee members now agree that the rule should be written in active voice.

The Committee Note accompanying subdivision (a) has been substantially rewritten. The revised Note reflects the changes made in the text of the rule, states more forcefully the normative case for the rule, and responds directly to the major arguments against the rule. It is admittedly an unusual Note, in that it is almost entirely devoted to defending rather than explaining the rule. Such a Note seems advisable, though, given the controversial nature of proposed Rule 32.1.

4. Summary of Public Comments

As I explained in the introduction to this memorandum, I will not summarize all of the testimony that we received about Rule 32.1, nor will I summarize each of the 513 comments that were submitted. Rather, I will describe the major arguments that witnesses and commentators made for and against adopting the proposed rule. I will then describe the suggestions that commentators made regarding the wording of Rule 32.1. I will conclude by listing those who commented in favor of and those who commented against adopting the proposed rule.

Please note that Sanford Svetcov, one of two members of the Advisory Committee who oppose Rule 32.1, asked that his dissenting views be communicated to the Standing Committee. A letter from Mr. Svetcov describing his reasons for opposing Rule 32.1 is attached to this memorandum.

a. Summary of Arguments Regarding Substance

i. Arguments Against Adopting Proposed Rule

1. A circuit should be free to conduct its business as it sees fit unless there is a compelling reason to impose uniformity. This is particularly true with respect to measures such as no-citation rules, which reflect decisions made by circuits about how best to allocate their scarce resources to meet the demands placed upon them. Circuits confront dramatically different local conditions. Among the features that vary from circuit to circuit are the size, subject matter, and complexity of the circuit's caseload; the number of active and senior judges on the circuit; the geographical scope of the circuit; the process used by the circuit to decide which cases are designated as unpublished; the time and attention devoted by circuit judges to unpublished opinions; and the legal culture of the circuit (such as the aggressiveness of the local bar). These features are best known to the judges who work within the circuit every day. No advisory committee composed entirely or almost entirely of outsiders should tell a circuit that it cannot implement a rule that the circuit has deemed necessary to handle its workload, unless that advisory committee has strong evidence that a uniform rule would serve a compelling interest.

2. The Appellate Rules Committee does not have such evidence with respect to Rule 32.1. The Committee Note fails to identify a single serious problem with the status quo that Rule 32.1 would solve.

a. The main problem identified by the Committee Note is that no-citation rules impose a “hardship” on attorneys by forcing them to “pick through the conflicting no-citation rules of the circuits in which they practice.”

i. This is not much of a hardship.

- Every circuit has implemented numerous local rules, and attorneys will continue to have to “pick through” those rules whether or not Rule 32.1 is approved. It is not unreasonable to ask an attorney who seeks to practice in a circuit to read and follow that circuit’s local rules — local rules that are readily available online.
- Among local rules, no-citation rules are particularly easy to follow, as they are clear and, in most circuits, stamped right on the face of unpublished opinions. A lawyer who reads an unpublished opinion is told up front exactly what use he or she can make of it.
- It is not surprising that the Committee has not identified a single occasion on which an attorney was in fact confused about the no-citation rule of a circuit, much less a single occasion on which an attorney was “sanctioned or accused of unethical conduct for improperly citing an ‘unpublished’ opinion.” Attorneys have no difficulty locating, understanding, and following no-citation rules.

ii. Rule 32.1 would do little to alleviate whatever hardship exists.

— Most litigators practice in only one state and one circuit. Thus, most litigators are inconvenienced far more by differences between the rules of their state courts and the rules of their federal courts than they are by differences among the rules of various federal courts. The minority of attorneys who practice regularly in multiple circuits tend to work for the Justice Department or for large law firms and thus have the time and resources to learn and follow each circuit's local rules.

— Although Rule 32.1 would help these Justice Department and big firm lawyers by creating uniformity among federal circuits, it would harm the typical attorney who practices in only one state by creating disuniformity between, for example, the citation rules of the California courts and the citation rules of the Ninth Circuit.

— Even within the federal courts, Rule 32.1 would create uniformity only with respect to citation. The rule would not create uniformity with respect to the use that circuits make of unpublished opinions. Thus, those who practice in multiple federal circuits would still have to become familiar with inconsistent rules about unpublished opinions.

iii. If uniformity is the Committee's concern, it would be far better, for the reasons described below, for the Committee to propose a rule that would uniformly bar the citation of unpublished opinions.

b. The Committee Note alludes to a potential First Amendment problem. No court has found that no-citation rules violate the First Amendment, and no court will. Courts impose myriad restrictions on what an attorney may say to a court and how an attorney may say it. A no-citation rule no more threatens First Amendment values than does a rule limiting the size of briefs to 30 pages.

3. Not only has the Committee failed to identify any problems that Rule 32.1 would solve, it has failed to identify any other benefits that would result from Rule 32.1.

a. Rule 32.1 would not, as the Committee Note claims, “expand[] the sources of insight and information that can be brought to the attention of judges.” Unpublished opinions provide little “insight” or “information” to anyone; to the contrary, they are most often used to mislead.

i. To understand why unpublished opinions do not provide much “insight” or “information,” one needs to appreciate when and how unpublished opinions are produced.

- Appellate courts have essentially two functions: error correction and law creation. Unpublished opinions are issued in the vast majority of cases that call upon a court only to perform the former function.
- Unpublished opinions merely inform the parties and the lower court of why the court of appeals concluded that the lower court did or did not err. Unpublished opinions do not establish a new rule of law; expand, narrow, or clarify an existing rule of law; apply an existing rule of law to facts that are significantly different from the facts presented in published opinions; create or resolve a conflict in the law; or address a legal issue in which the public has a significant interest. As one judge wrote: “[O]ur uncitable memorandum dispositions do nothing more than apply settled circuit law to the facts and circumstances of an individual case. They do not make or alter or nuance the law. The principles we use to decide cases in memorandum dispositions are already on the books and fully citable.” [03-AP-129]

- Unpublished opinions are also issued in cases that do present important legal questions, but in which the court is not confident that it answered those questions correctly — most often because the facts were unusual or because the advocacy was poor or lopsided. In such circumstances, a court may not want to speak authoritatively or comprehensively about an issue — or foreclose a particular line of argument — when a future case may present more representative facts or more skilled advocacy.
- Because an unpublished opinion functions solely as a one-time explanation to the parties and the lower court, judges are careful to make sure that the result is correct, but they spend very little time reviewing the opinion itself. Usually the opinion is drafted by a member of the circuit’s staff or by a law clerk; often, the staff member or law clerk simply converts a bench memo into an opinion. The opinion will generally say almost nothing about the facts, because its intended audience — the parties and the lower court — are already familiar with the facts. It is common for a panel to spend as little as five or ten minutes on an unpublished opinion. The opinions usually do not go through multiple drafts, members of the panel usually do not request modifications, and the opinions are not usually circulated to the entire circuit before they are released.

- An unpublished opinion may accurately express the views of none of the members of the panel. As long as the result is correct, judges do not care much about the language. As one judge explained: “What matters is the result, not the precise language of the disposition or even its reasoning. Mem dispos reflect the panel’s agreement on the outcome of the case, nothing more.” [03-AP-075]

ii. Because of these features, citing unpublished opinions will not only provide little “insight” or “information,” but will actually result in judges being misled.

- Unpublished opinions are poor sources of law. A court’s holding in any case cannot be understood outside of the factual context, but unpublished opinions say little or nothing about the facts (because they are written for those already familiar with the case). Thus, it is difficult to discern what an unpublished opinion held.
- Because unpublished opinions are hurriedly drafted by staff and clerks, and because they receive little attention from judges, they often contain statements of law that are imprecise or inaccurate. Even slight variations in the way that a legal principle is stated can have significant consequences. If unpublished opinions could be cited, courts would often be led to believe that the law had been changed in some way by an unpublished opinion, when no such change was intended.

- Unpublished opinions are also a poor source of information about a judge’s views on a legal issue. As noted, it is possible that an unpublished opinion does not accurately express the views of any judge. Citing unpublished opinions might mislead lower courts and others about the views of a circuit’s judges.

iii. Even in the rare case in which an unpublished opinion might be persuasive “by virtue of the thoroughness of its research or the persuasiveness of its reasoning,” Rule 32.1 is not needed.

- First, any party can petition a court of appeals to publish an opinion that has been designated as unpublished. Courts recognize that they sometimes err in designating opinions as unpublished and are quite willing to correct those mistakes when those mistakes are brought to their attention.
- Second, and more importantly, nothing prevents any party in any case from borrowing — word-for-word, if the party wishes — the “research” and “reasoning” of an unpublished opinion. Parties want to cite unpublished opinions not because they are inherently persuasive, but because parties want to argue (explicitly or implicitly) that a panel of the circuit agreed with a particular argument — and for that reason, and not because of the opinion’s “research” or “reasoning,” the circuit should agree with the argument again. As one judge commented: “[N]othing prevents a party from copying wholesale the thorough research or persuasive reasoning of an unpublished disposition — without citation. But that’s not what the party seeking to actually cite the disposition wants to do at all; rather, it wants the added boost of claiming that three court of appeals judges endorse that reasoning.” [03-AP-169]

This, however, is a dishonest and misleading use of unpublished opinions. As described, judges often sign off on unpublished opinions that do not accurately express their views; indeed, it will be the rare unpublished opinion that will precisely and comprehensively describe the views of any of the panel’s judges.

iv. In short, no-citation rules merely prevent parties from using unpublished opinions illegitimately — to mislead a court. All legitimate uses of unpublished opinions — such as mining them for nuggets of research or reasoning — are already available to parties.

b. Rule 32.1 would not, as the Committee Note claims, “mak[e] the entire process more transparent to attorneys, parties, and the general public.”

i. As the Committee Note itself describes, unpublished opinions are already widely available and widely read by judges, attorneys, parties, and the general public — and sometimes reviewed by the Supreme Court. Those opinions can be requested from the clerk, reviewed on the websites of the circuits and other free Internet sites, and researched with Westlaw and Lexis. Unpublished opinions are no less “transparent” than published opinions. They are not hidden from anyone.

ii. Although proponents of Rule 32.1 often cite suspicions that courts use unpublished opinions to duck difficult issues or to hide decisions that are contrary to law, there is no evidence whatsoever that these suspicions are valid. Even those (very few) judges who have expressed support for Rule 32.1 have cited only the perception that unpublished opinions are used improperly; they agree that the perception is not accurate. Since the Ninth Circuit changed its no-citation rule to allow parties to bring to the court’s attention in a rehearing petition any unpublished opinions that were in conflict with the decision of the panel, almost no parties have been able to do so. Every judge makes mistakes, but there is no evidence that judges are intentionally and systematically using unpublished opinions for improper purposes.

4. Although Rule 32.1 would not address any real problem with the status quo — and although Rule 32.1 would not result in any real benefit — Rule 32.1 would inflict enormous costs on judges, attorneys, and parties.

a. Judges

i. The judges of many circuits are now overwhelmed. The number of appeals filed has increased dramatically faster than the number of authorized judgeships, and Congress has been slow to fill judicial vacancies. Judges and their staffs are already stretched to the limit; there is no “margin for error” when it comes to imposing new responsibilities on them.

ii. Drafting published opinions takes a lot of time. Because judges know that such opinions will bind future panels and lower courts — and because judges know that those opinions will be widely cited as reflecting the views of the judges who write or join them — published opinions are drafted with painstaking care. A published opinion provides extensive information about the facts and the procedural background, because it is written for strangers to the case, and because those strangers will not be able to identify its precise holding without such information. The author of a published opinion will devote dozens (sometimes hundreds) of hours to writing, editing, and polishing multiple drafts. Although law clerks may help with the research or produce a first draft, the authoring judge will invest a great deal of his or her own time into drafting the opinion. The final draft will be reviewed carefully by the other members of the panel, who will often request revisions. Before the opinion is released, it will be circulated to all of the members of the court, and other judges will sometimes request changes.

iii. By contrast, as described above, unpublished opinions generally take very little time. They are written quickly by court staff or law clerks, and judges give them only cursory attention — precisely because judges know that the opinions need to function only as explanations to those involved in the cases and will not be cited to future panels or to lower courts within the circuit.

iv. Rule 32.1 would force judges to spend much more time writing unpublished opinions just to make them suitable to be cited as persuasive authority. Judges will also take the time to write concurring and dissenting opinions, to prevent courts from misunderstanding their views. The Committee cannot:

— change the audience for unpublished opinions (from the parties, their attorneys, and the lower court under the current system to future panels, district courts within the circuit, and the rest of the world under Rule 32.1), and

— change the purpose of unpublished opinions (from giving a brief, one-time explanation to those already familiar with the case under the current system to being used forever to persuade courts to rule a particular way under Rule 32.1), and not

— not change the nature of unpublished opinions.

As one judge commented, “[the] efficiency [of unpublished opinions] is made possible only when the authoring judge has confidence that short-hand statements, clearly understood by the parties, will not later be scrutinized for their legal significance by a panel not privy to the specifics of the case at hand.” [03-AP-329]

v. Because judges will spend much more time writing unpublished opinions, at least two consequences will follow:

- Judges will have less time available to devote to published decisions — the decisions that really matter. The quality of published opinions will suffer. The law will be less clear. Apparent inconsistencies will abound. Inadvertent intra- and inter-circuit conflicts will arise more frequently. All of this will result in more litigation, more appeals, and more en banc proceedings, which will result in even more demands on judges, which will give them even less time to devote to writing published opinions.
- Parties will have to wait much longer to get unpublished decisions. Parties now often get an unpublished decision in a few days; under Rule 32.1, they may have to wait for a year or more.

vi. Although Rule 32.1 will reduce the time that judges have available to spend on opinions, it will increase the amount of attention that drafting opinions will require.

- Parties will cite more cases to the courts, meaning that conscientious judges and their law clerks will have more opinions to read, explain, and distinguish in the course of writing opinions. As one judge wrote: “Once brought to the court’s attention, . . . there is no way simply to ignore our memorandum dispositions.” [03-AP-285]

- This will be a time-consuming process, because to fully understand an unpublished opinion — which, as described above, will usually say little about the facts — the judge or the law clerk will have to go back and read the briefs and record in the case.
- The result will be that parties — who now often wait a year or more to get a published decision — will have to wait even longer.

vii. Of course, Rule 32.1 can’t change the fact that there are only 24 hours in a day. Judges are already stretched to the limit. If they have to spend more time on both published and unpublished opinions, they will have to compensate in some way. One way that judges will compensate is by issuing no opinion in an increasing number of cases — i.e., by disposing of an increasing number of cases with one-line orders.

- One-line dispositions are unfair to the parties, who are entitled to some explanation of why they won or lost an appeal, as well as to some assurance that their arguments were read, understood, and taken seriously. Parties who are not told why they won or lost an appeal — and who are not provided with any evidence that their arguments were even read — will lose confidence in the judicial system.

- One-line dispositions are unfair to lower court judges, who are entitled to know why they have been affirmed or reversed. Lower court judges cannot correct their mistakes unless those mistakes are made known to them.
- One-line dispositions deprive parties of a meaningful chance to petition for en banc reconsideration by the circuit or certiorari from the Supreme Court. Without any explanation of the panel’s decision, it is almost impossible for the en banc court or the Supreme Court to know if a case is worth further review.
- When judges issue an unpublished opinion, they have to discuss the basic rationale for the disposition. That provides at least some discipline. That discipline is completely lacking when a panel issues a one-line disposition.

b. Attorneys

i. Critics of no-citation rules represent only a small fraction of the bar — although, because they are very vocal, they have created the illusion that there is widespread dissatisfaction with such rules. In fact, most lawyers support no-citation rules, and for good reason.

ii. Abolishing no-citation rules would vastly increase the body of case law that would have to be researched. If unpublished opinions can be cited, then they might influence the court; and if unpublished opinions might influence the court, then an attorney must research them. As one oft-repeated “talking point” put it: “As a matter of prudence, and probably professional ethics, practitioners could not ignore relevant opinions decided by the very circuit court before which they are now litigating.” [03-AP-025]

iii. Even an attorney who understands that unpublished opinions are largely useless and who does not want to waste time researching them will have to prepare for the possibility that his or her opponent will use them. One way or another, attorneys will have to read unpublished opinions.

iv. An attorney will be faced with a difficult dilemma when he or she runs across an unpublished opinion that is contrary to his or her position. Even if unpublished opinions are formally treated as non-binding, “the advocate is faced with the Hobson’s choice of either using up precious pages in her brief distinguishing the unpublished decisions, or running the uncertain risk of condemnation from her opponent (or worse, the court) for ignoring those decisions. In other words, even if it were possible to maintain some sort of formal distinction between permissively citable unpublished decisions and mandatory, precedential published opinions, the substance of the distinction would quickly erode.” [03-AP-462]

v. The hardship imposed on attorneys is not just a function of the dramatic increase in the number of opinions that they will have to read; it is also a function of the nature of those opinions. Because unpublished opinions say so little about the facts, attorneys will struggle to understand them. Attorneys will often have to retrieve the briefs or records of old cases to be certain that they understand what unpublished opinions held.

vi. Attorneys already find it almost impossible to keep current on the law — even the law in one or two specialities. So many courts are publishing so many opinions — and there are so many ambiguities and inconsistencies in those opinions — that it is often very difficult for a conscientious attorney to know what the law

“is” on a particular question. Rule 32.1 will compound this problem many times over, not only because the number of opinions that will “matter” will multiply, but because the unpublished opinions that will have to be consulted are “a particularly watery form of precedent.” [03-AP-169] Because so little time goes into writing them, unpublished opinions will introduce into the corpus of the law thousands of ambiguous, imprecise, and misleading statements that will be represented as the “holdings” of circuits.

vii. Litigators are not the only attorneys who will be burdened by Rule 32.1. Transactional attorneys and others who counsel clients about how to structure their affairs will have more opinions to read and, because more law means more uncertainty, will have difficulty advising their clients about the legal implications of their conduct. This problem will be particularly acute for attorneys who must advise large corporations and other organizations that operate in multiple jurisdictions.

viii. While all attorneys — litigators and non-litigators — will be harmed by Rule 32.1, some will be harmed more than others.

— Unpublished opinions are not as readily available as published opinions. Not all libraries and legal offices can afford to purchase the Federal Appendix and rent space to store it. And not all lawyers can afford to use Westlaw or Lexis. (Indeed, not all attorneys have access to computers.) The E-Government Act will help, but it will not level the playing field entirely. For example, the Act will not require circuits to provide electronic access to their old unpublished decisions, and it is unlikely that researching unpublished opinions on circuit websites will be as easy as researching those opinions on Westlaw or Lexis.

- Even if the day arrives when unpublished opinions become equally available to all, attorneys will still have to read them. Some attorneys are already overwhelmed with work or have clients who cannot pay for more of their time. These attorneys — including solo practitioners, small firm lawyers, public defenders, and CJA-appointed counsel — will bear the brunt of Rule 32.1. Rule 32.1 will thus increase the already substantial advantage enjoyed by large firms, government attorneys, and in-house counsel at large corporations.

c. Parties

i. As described above, all parties in all cases — both those that terminate in published opinions and those that terminate in unpublished opinions — will have to wait longer for their cases to be resolved. Delays are bad for everyone, but they are particularly harmful for the most vulnerable litigants — such as plaintiffs in personal injury cases who can no longer pay their medical bills or habeas petitioners who are unlawfully incarcerated.

ii. As described above, Rule 32.1 will result in more one-line dispositions. More parties will never be given an explanation for why they lost their appeal or even assurance that their arguments were taken seriously. This will result in less transparency and less confidence in the judicial system.

iii. As described above, Rule 32.1 will increase the already high cost of litigation. Clients will have to pay more attorneys to read more cases.

iv. Increasing the cost of litigation will, of course, harm the poor and middle class the most, adding to the already considerable advantages enjoyed by the powerful and the wealthy.

v. Rule 32.1 will particularly disadvantage pro se litigants and prisoners, who often do not have access to the Internet or to the Federal Appendix.

5. Rule 32.1 could harm state courts. For example, the rule would permit litigants to cite and federal courts to rely upon the unpublished opinions of the California state courts in diversity and other actions, even though the California courts themselves have determined that these cases should not be looked to for expositions of state law. This, in turn, will enable litigants to use the unpublished decisions of the California state courts to influence the development of California law, through the “back door” of the federal courts. Thus, many of the costs imposed by Rule 32.1 on federal courts — such as the need for judges to spend more time writing unpublished opinions — will also be imposed on state courts.

6. The assurances provided in the Committee Note that Rule 32.1 will not inflict the costs described above are unpersuasive.

a. The Committee Note admits that Rule 32.1 would inflict substantial costs of the type described above if it required courts to treat their unpublished opinions as binding precedent, but then gives assurance that Rule 32.1 does not do so. The Committee is naive in believe that a clear distinction between “precedential” and “non-precedential” will be maintained.

i. As noted, parties will be citing unpublished opinions precisely for their precedential value — that is, as part of an argument (implicit or explicit) that because a panel of a circuit decided an issue one way in the past, the circuit should decide the issue the same way now. The only real interest that proponents of Rule 32.1 have in citing unpublished opinions is as precedent.

ii. When circuits are confronted with this argument, they will not be able to say simply that the prior unpublished opinion is not binding precedent and therefore can be ignored. Rather, the court will have to distinguish it or explain why it will not be followed. As one group of judges commented: “As a practical matter, we expect that [unpublished opinions] will be accorded significant precedential effect, simply because the judges of a court will be naturally reluctant to repudiate or ignore previous decisions.” [03-AP-396] From the point of view of the court’s workload, then, the Committee Note’s assurance that courts will not have to treat their unpublished opinions as binding precedent will make little difference.

iii. This phenomenon will be even more apparent in the lower courts. It will be a rare district court judge who will ignore an unpublished opinion of the circuit that will review his or her decision. If unpublished opinions are cited to lower courts, lower courts will have to treat them as though they were binding, even if that is not technically true.

iv. In sum, all of the consequences described above — such as courts having to spend more time writing unpublished opinions and attorneys having to spend more time researching them — will occur, whether or not the unpublished opinions are labeled “non-binding.”

b. The Committee Note’s argument that there is no compelling reason to treat unpublished opinions different than such sources as district court opinions, law review articles, newspaper columns, or Shakespearian sonnets misses a few important distinctions:

i. The fact that law review articles or newspaper columns can be cited in a brief will not have any effect on the author of such materials. The author of a law review article or a newspaper column is going to do precisely the same amount of work — and write precisely the same words — whether or not his or her work can later be cited to a court. By contrast, making the unpublished opinions of a court of appeals citable will affect their authors, as described above.

ii. There is no chance that law review articles or newspaper columns will be cited by parties for their precedential value — that is, as part of an argument that, because a circuit did x once, it should do x again. Law review articles, newspaper columns, and the like are cited only for their persuasive value because that is the only value they have. An unpublished opinion, by contrast, is cited by a party who wants a future panel of the circuit or a lower court within the circuit to decide an issue a particular way — not because the unpublished opinion, like a law review article, is powerfully persuasive, but because the unpublished opinion, unlike the law review article, was at least nominally issued in the name of the circuit.

iii. The same point can be made about the opinions of other circuits, lower federal courts, state courts, or foreign jurisdictions. As one commentator wrote:

“When the opinions, even the unpublished ones, of another court are cited, the underlying argument is as follows: the other court accepted or advanced a particular reasoning and, therefore, this court should too — it can, and should, trust the other court’s judgment. When an unpublished opinion of the same court is cited, however, the underlying argument is invariably a precedential one, in the most basic sense: this court accepted or advanced a particular reasoning in another case and, therefore, it would be fundamentally unfair not to apply that same rationale in the instant case. Such opinions are cited for their precedential value.” [03-AP-478]

iv. There is also no chance that a lower court will feel bound to adhere to the views of the author of a law review article or newspaper column. As one judge wrote, “Shakespearian sonnets, advertising jingles and newspaper columns are not, and cannot be mistaken for, expressions of the law of the circuit. Thus, there is no risk that they will be given weight far disproportionate to their intrinsic value.” [03-AP-169] Or, as one bar committee wrote, “unlike unpublished decisions, there is no risk these other materials will be mistaken for the law of the circuit or given undue weight by the lower courts or litigants.” [03-AP-319]

v. According to commentators, this risk is particularly acute in the lower courts, which is why some no-citation rules apply to those courts, as well as to parties. “The word of a federal Court of Appeals will not be treated as a law review article or newspaper column, no matter how many admonitions from the appellate court that its unpublished opinions have no precedential authority. Every judge and lawyer in America has internalized the hierarchical nature of our justice system; the word of a federal Court of Appeals, even unpublished, will not be treated the same as the word of a legal scholar or newspaper columnist.” [03-AP-322]

c. The Committee Note is wrong in suggesting that, because some circuits have liberalized no-citation rules without experiencing problems, the concerns about Rule 32.1 are overblown.

i. The conditions of each circuit vary significantly, making it hazardous to assume that the experience of one circuit will be duplicated in another. As noted above, circuits vary with respect to such things as the size, subject matter, and complexity of the caseload; the number of judges; and the local legal culture. Just because the Fifth Circuit is able to permit the citation of unpublished opinions does not mean that the Ninth Circuit can do so.

ii. No circuit has gone as far as Rule 32.1 would in permitting the citation of unpublished opinions. All circuits discourage such citation, forbid it in some circumstances, or both. And three circuits with relatively liberal citation rules — the Third, Fifth, and Eleventh — either do not make or have only recently made their unpublished opinions widely available. It is virtually costless for a circuit whose unpublished opinions do not appear in the Federal Appendix or in the Westlaw and Lexis databases to allow those opinions to be cited.

iii. Some circuits that have liberalized no-citation rules have done so only recently, so it is too early to know whether they will experience difficulties.

iv. Some of the circuits that permit liberal citation of unpublished opinions also make frequent use of one-line dispositions. This supports — rather than refutes — the arguments of those who oppose Rule 32.1.

7. Rule 32.1 is not a “general rule[] of practice and procedure” because, if Rule 32.1 is adopted, “some judges will make the opinion more elaborate in order to make clear the context of the ruling, while other judges will shorten the opinion in order to provide less citable material.” Because Rule 32.1 would “affect the construction and import of opinions,” the rule is “beyond the scope of the rulemaking authority of 28 U.S.C. § 2072.” [03-AP-329]

8. If, despite all of these arguments, the Committee decides to forge ahead with Rule 32.1, it should at least amend the rule so that it applies only prospectively — that is, so that it applies only to unpublished decisions issued after the rule’s effective date. It is unfair to allow citation of opinions that judges wrote under the assumption that they would never be cited. The D.C. Circuit’s decision to abolish its no-citation rule was applied prospectively only; the Committee should follow the D.C. Circuit’s lead.

ii. Arguments For Adopting Proposed Rule

1. It is not Rule 32.1, but no-citation rules, that require a compelling justification. In a democracy, the presumption is that citizens may discuss with the government the actions that the government has taken. Under the First Amendment, the presumption is that prior restraints of speech — especially speech about the government made to the government — are invalid. In a common law system, the presumption is that judicial decisions are citable. In an adversary system, the presumption is that lawyers are free to make the best arguments available. No-citation rules — through which judges instruct litigants, “You may not even mention what we’ve done in the past, much less engage us in a discussion about whether what we’ve done in the past should influence what we do in this case” — are profoundly antithetical to American values. The burden should not be on the Committee to defend Rule 32.1 but on opponents of Rule 32.1 to defend no-citation rules.

2. The main problem created by no-citation rules — a problem that Rule 32.1 would eliminate — is that no-citation rules deprive the courts, attorneys, and parties of the use of unpublished opinions. The evidence is overwhelming that unpublished opinions are indeed a valuable source of “insight” and “information.”

a. First, unpublished opinions are often read. “[L]awyers, district court judges, and appellate judges regularly read and rely on unpublished decisions despite prohibitions on doing so.” [03-AP-406] Numerous commentators — supporters and opponents of Rule 32.1 alike — said that they regularly read unpublished opinions.

b. Second, unpublished opinions are often cited by attorneys. One commentator wrote: “My own experience has been that the prohibition on [citation] currently in effect in the lower courts of the Ninth Circuit is utterly disregarded, not just by bad lawyers but also by good ones — even by leading lawyers, not always, to be sure, but in many cases when there is no binding, published authority available.” [03-AP-473]

c. Third, unpublished decisions are often cited by judges. Researchers have identified hundreds of citations to unpublished opinions by appellate courts and district courts — including appellate courts and district courts in jurisdictions that have adopted no-citation rules. One of the most pointed of those citations appears in Harris v. United Federation of Teachers, No. 02-Civ. 3257 (GEL), 2002 WL 1880391, at *1 n.2 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 14, 2002):

“There is apparently no published Second Circuit authority directly on point for the proposition that § 301 does not confer jurisdiction over fair representation suits against public employee unions. In the ‘unpublished’ opinion in Corredor, which of course is published to the world on both the Lexis and Westlaw services, the Court expressly decides the point Yet the Second Circuit continues to adhere to its technological-outdated rule prohibiting parties from citing such decisions . . . thus pretending that this decision never happened and that it remains free to decide an identical case in the opposite manner because it remains unbound by this precedent. This Court nevertheless finds the opinion of a distinguished Second Circuit panel highly persuasive, at least as worthy of citation as law review student notes, and eminently predictive of how the Court would in fact decide a future case such as this one.”

d. Fourth, there are some areas of the law in which unpublished opinions are particularly valuable. One appellate judge, after describing a recent occasion on which a staff attorney had cited many unpublished decisions in advising a panel of judges about how to dispose of a case, commented as follows:

“Judges rely on this material for one reason; it is helpful. For instance, unpublished orders often address recurring issues of adjective law rarely covered in published opinions. . . . We have all encountered the situation in which there is no precedent in our own circuit, but research reveals that colleagues in other circuits have written on the issue, albeit in an unpublished order. I see no reason why we ought not be allowed to consider such material, and I certainly do not understand why counsel, obligated to present the best possible case for his client, should be denied the right to comment on legal material in the public domain.” [03-AP-335]

e. Fifth, unpublished opinions can be particularly helpful to district court judges, who so often must exercise discretion in applying relatively settled law to an infinite variety of facts. For example, district courts are instructed to strive for uniformity in sentencing, and thus they are often anxious for any evidence about how similarly situated defendants are being treated by other judges. Many unpublished opinions provide this information. The value of unpublished opinions to district court judges may explain why only 4 of the 1000-plus active and senior district judges in the United States — including only 2 of the 150-plus district judges in the Ninth Circuit — submitted comments opposing Rule 32.1.

f. Sixth, there is not already “too much law,” as some opponents of Rule 32.1 claim. As one distinguished federal appellate judge wrote in one of his books: “Despite the vast number of published opinions, most federal circuit judges will confess that a surprising fraction of federal appeals, at least in civil cases, are difficult to decide not because there are too many precedents but because there are too few on point.” Attorneys are most likely to cite — and judges are most likely to consult — an unpublished opinion not because it contains a sweeping statement of law (a statement that can be found in countless published opinions), but because the facts of the case are very similar to the facts of the case before the court. Parties should be able to bring such factually-similar cases to a court’s attention, and courts should be able to consult them for what they are worth.

g. For all of these reasons, no-citation rules should be abolished. When attorneys can and do read unpublished opinions — and when judges can and do get influenced by unpublished opinions — it makes no sense to prohibit attorneys and judges from talking about the opinions that both are reading.

3. In addition to the evidence that unpublished opinions do indeed often serve as sources of “insight” and “information” for both attorneys and judges, there are other reasons to doubt the oft-repeated claim that unpublished opinions merely apply settled law to routine facts and therefore have no precedential value:

a. It is difficult for a court to predict whether a case will have precedential value. “Only when a case comes along with arguably comparable facts does the precedential relevance of an earlier decision-with-opinion arise. This point naturally leads one to question how an appellate panel can, ex ante, determine the precedential significance of its ruling. Lacking omniscience, an appellate panel cannot predict what may come before its court in future days.” [03-AP-435] As one attorney commented: “[W]e can and do expect a lot from our judges, but the assumption that any court can know, at the time of issuing a decision, that the decision neither adds (whatsoever) to already existing case law and that it could never contribute (in any way) to future development of the law, strikes me as hero-worship taken beyond the cusp of reality.” [03-AP-454]

b. Even if a court could reliably predict whether an opinion establishes a precedent worth being cited, making that decision would itself take a lot of time. “The very choice of treating an appealed case as non-precedential, if done conscientiously, has to be preceded by thoughtful analysis of the relevant precedents.” [03-AP-435] Time, of course, is precisely what courts who issue unpublished opinions say they do not have.

c. Given these limitations, it is not surprising that courts often designate as “unpublished” decisions that should be citable. The most famous example involves the Fourth Circuit’s declaring an Act of Congress unconstitutional in an unpublished opinion — something that the Supreme Court labeled “remarkable and unusual.” United States v. Edge Broadcasting Co., 509 U.S. 418, 425 n.3 (1993). Other examples abound. For example, in United States v. Rivera-Sanchez, 222 F.3d 1057, 1062-63 (9th Cir. 2000), the court described how 20 inconsistent unpublished opinions on the same unresolved and difficult question of law had been issued by Ninth Circuit panels before a citable decision settled the issue.

d. More evidence of the unreliability of these designations can be found in the many unpublished decisions that have been reviewed by the Supreme Court. (A recent example is Muhammad v. Close, 124 S. Ct. 1303, 1306 (2004), in which the Supreme Court reversed an unpublished decision that “was flawed as a matter of fact” — suggesting that the facts were neither clear nor straightforward — “and as a matter of law” — because the opinion took what the Supreme Court regarded as the wrong side of a circuit split.) The fact that the Supreme Court decides to review a case does not necessarily mean that the circuit made a mistake in designating the opinion as unpublished, but the fact that an opinion was deemed “certworthy” by the Supreme Court does suggest that something worthy of being cited may have occurred in that opinion.

e. Many unpublished opinions reverse the decisions of district courts or are accompanied by concurrences or dissents — implying that their results may not be clear or uncontroversial.

f. Researchers who have studied unpublished opinions have found that the decision to designate an opinion as unpublished is influenced by factors other than the novelty or complexity of the issues. For example, the background of judges plays a role. The more experience that a judge had with an area of law in practice, the less likely the judge is to publish opinions in that area (which, ironically, means that citable opinions in that area will disproportionately be published by the judges who know the least about it).

4. Even if, despite all of this evidence, it remains unclear whether unpublished opinions offer much insight or information, Rule 32.1 has a major advantage over no-citation rules: It lets the “market” function and determine the value of unpublished opinions.

a. A glaring inconsistency runs through the arguments of the opponents of Rule 32.1. On the one hand, they argue that unpublished opinions contain nothing of value — that such opinions are useless, fact-free, poorly-worded, hastily-converted bench memos written by 26-year-old law clerks. On the other hand, they argue that, if Rule 32.1 is approved, attorneys will be devoting thousands of hours to researching these worthless opinions, briefs will be crammed with citations to these worthless opinions, district courts will feel compelled to follow these worthless opinions, and circuit judges will have no alternative but to carefully analyze and distinguish these worthless opinions.

b. Opponents of Rule 32.1 can’t have it both ways. Either (i) unpublished opinions contain something of value, in which case parties should be able to cite them, or (ii) unpublished opinions contain nothing of value, in which case parties won’t cite them.

c. Under no-citation rules, judges make this decision; they bar the citation of unpublished decisions. If they’re wrong in their assessment, the “market” cannot correct them because there is no “market.” Under Rule 32.1, the “market” makes this decision. Unpublished opinions will be cited if they are valuable, and they will not be cited if they are not valuable.

5. No-citation rules create several other problems — problems that Rule 32.1 would eliminate:

a. No-citation rules lead to arbitrariness and injustice. Our common law system is founded on the notion that like cases should be decided in a like manner. It helps no one — not judges, not attorneys, not parties — when attorneys are forbidden even to tell a court how it decided a similar case in the past. Such a practice can only increase the chances that like cases will not be treated alike.

b. No-citation rules undermine accountability. It is striking that judges opposing Rule 32.1 have argued, in essence: “If parties could tell us what we’ve done, we’d feel morally obliged to justify ourselves. Therefore, we are going to forbid parties from telling us what we’ve done.” Put differently, judges opposing Rule 32.1 have insisted on the right to decide x in one case and “not x” in another case and not even be asked to reconcile the seemingly inconsistent decisions. Judges always have the right to explain or distinguish their past decisions or to honestly and openly change their minds. But judges should not have the right to forbid parties from mentioning their past decisions. As one judge wrote: “Public accountability requires that we not be immune from criticism; allowing the bar to render that criticism in their submissions to us is one of the most effective ways to ensure that we give each case the attention that it deserves.” [03-AP-335]

c. No-citation rules undermine confidence in the judicial system.

i. No-citation rules make absolutely no sense to non-lawyers. It is almost impossible to explain to a client why a court will not allow his or her lawyer to mention that the court has addressed the same issue in the past — or applied the same law to a similar set of facts. Clients just don’t get it.

ii. Because no-citation rules are so difficult for the average citizen to understand, they create the appearance that courts have something to hide — that unpublished opinions are being used for improper purposes. As one judge wrote:

“It is hard for courts to insist that lawyers pretend that a large body of decisions, readily indexed and searched, does not exist. Lawyers can cite everything from decisions of the Supreme Court to ‘revised and extended remarks’ inserted into the Congressional Record to op-ed pieces in local newspapers; why should the ‘unpublished’ judicial orders be the only matter off limits to citation and argument? It implies judges have something to hide.

“In some corners, there is a perception that they do — that unpublished orders are used to sweep under the rug departures from precedent. [This judge is confident that, at least in his circuit, unpublished opinions are not used improperly.] Still, to the extent that . . . the bar believes that this occurs, whether it does or not . . . allowing citation serves a salutary purpose and reinforces public confidence in the administration of justice.” [03-AP-367]

iii. No-citation rules also give rise to the appearance — if not the reality — of two classes of justice: high-quality justice for wealthy parties represented by big law firms, and low-quality justice for “no-name appellants represented by no-name attorneys.” [03-AP-408]

— Large institutional litigants — and the big firms that represent them — disproportionately receive careful attention to their briefs, oral argument, and a published decision written by a judge. Others — including the poor and the middle class, prisoners, and pro se litigants — disproportionately receive a quick skim of their briefs, no oral argument, and an unpublished decision copied out of a bench memo by a clerk.

— Defenders of no-citation rules insist that, although judges pay little attention to the language of unpublished opinions, they are careful to ensure that the results are correct. The problem with this argument is that it “assumes that reasoning and writing are not linked, that is, that clarity characterizes the panel’s thinking about the proper decisional rule, but writing out that clear thinking is too burdensome.” [03-AP-435] As every judge who has had the experience of finding that an initial decision just “won’t write” — and that is every judge — it is manifestly untrue that reasoning and writing can be separated. One judge put it this way: “There is . . . a wholesome, and perhaps necessary, discipline in our ensuring that unpublished orders can be cited to the courts. . . . [R]elegating this material to non-citable status is an invitation toward mediocrity in decisionmaking and the maintenance of a subclass of cases that often do not get equal treatment with the cases in which a published decision is rendered.” [03-AP-335]

d. The inconsistent local rules among circuits do indeed create a hardship for attorneys who practice in more than one circuit — a hardship that opponents of Rule 32.1 too quickly dismiss.

i. The suggestion of some opponents of Rule 32.1 that the Committee is insincere in its concern for the impact of inconsistent local rules on those who practice in more than one circuit is belied by the fact that perhaps no problem has been the focus of more of the Advisory Committee's and Standing Committee's attention over the past few years. The Appellate Rules have been amended several times — most recently in 2002 — to eliminate variations in local rules. Rule 32.1 and other of the rules published in August 2003 would do the same. The Advisory Committee and the Standing Committee believe strongly that an attorney should be able to file an appeal in a circuit without having to read and follow dozens of pages of local rules.

ii. Inconsistent local rules can only be eliminated one at a time. Any rule that makes federal appellate practice more uniform by eliminating one set of inconsistent local rules is obviously going to leave other inconsistent local rules untouched. That is not an excuse for opposing the rule.

e. Opponents of Rule 32.1 have also been too quick to dismiss the First Amendment problems posed by no-citation rules.

i. No-citation rules offend First Amendment values — if not the First Amendment itself — in banning truthful speech about a matter of public concern — indeed, about a governmental action that is in the public domain. They also offend First Amendment values in forbidding an attorney from making a particular type of argument in support of his or her client — a type of argument that is forbidden, at least in part, because it would put the court to the inconvenience of having to defend, explain, or distinguish one of its own prior actions. What the Supreme Court said in Legal Services Corp. v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533, 544-45 (2001), about restrictions that Congress had placed on legal services attorneys could be said about the restrictions that no-citation rules place on all attorneys:

“Restricting LSC attorneys in . . . presenting arguments and analyses to the courts distorts the legal system by altering the traditional role of the attorneys. . . . An informed, independent judiciary presumes an informed, independent bar. . . . By seeking to prohibit the analysis of certain legal issues and to truncate presentation to the courts, the enactment under review prohibits speech and expression upon which courts must depend for the proper exercise of the judicial power.”

ii. No-citation rules are not like limits on the size of briefs. They differ in the character of the restriction and in the interest purportedly being served by the restriction. A 30-page limit on briefs does not forbid an attorney from making a particular argument or citing a particular action of the court, and page limits — which every court in America imposes — are necessary if courts are to function. No-citation rules, by contrast, forbid particular arguments (arguments that ask a court to follow one of its prior unpublished decisions), are imposed by only some courts, and are imposed by courts in order to protect themselves from having to take responsibility for their prior actions.

6. In opposing Rule 32.1, commentators offer a “parade of horrors” that they claim will be suffered by judges, attorneys, and parties if no-citation rules are abolished.

a. Many of the “horrors” in this parade are the same “horrors” that were paraded out when unpublished opinions became available on Westlaw and Lexis — and then again when unpublished opinions started being published in the Federal Appendix. None of the predictions was accurate.

b. The predictions regarding Rule 32.1 are no more reliable. Dozens of state and federal courts have already liberalized or abolished no-citation rules, and there is absolutely no evidence that the dire predictions of Rule 32.1’s opponents have been realized in those jurisdictions. There is no evidence, for example, that judges are spending more time writing unpublished opinions or that attorneys are bombarding courts with citations to unpublished opinions or that legal bills have skyrocketed for clients. While it is true that there are differences among circuits, the circuits that permit citation are similar enough to the circuits that forbid citation that there should be some evidence that liberal citation rules cause harm, and yet no such evidence exists.

c. It is no accident that most of the opposition to permitting citation to unpublished opinions comes from judges and attorneys who have no experience permitting citation to unpublished opinions. It is likewise no accident that little opposition to Rule 32.1 was heard from the judges and attorneys who have such experience. As one judge commented: “What would matter are adverse effects and adverse reactions from the bar or judges of the 9 circuits (and 21 states) that now allow citation to unpublished opinions. And from that quarter no protest has been heard. This implies to me that the benefits of accountability and uniform national practice carry the day.” [03-AP-367]

7. Regarding the argument that Rule 32.1 would dramatically increase the workload of judges:

a. First, there is no evidence that this has occurred in jurisdictions that have abandoned or liberalized citation rules. One reason why liberalizing citation rules does not seem to result in more work for judges is that unpublished opinions have never been written just for parties and counsel, as proponents of no-citation rules insist. Those decisions have also been written for the en banc court and the Supreme Court. “This may be why the nine circuits that allow citation to these documents have not experienced difficulty: the prospect of citation to a different panel requires no more of the order’s author than does the prospect of criticism in a petition for a writ of certiorari.” [03-AP-367]

b. Second, judges already have available to them options that would reduce their workloads far more than no-citation rules.

i. Judges now spend too much time on drafting published opinions.

— The overwork that judges cite in arguing against Rule 32.1 is in part a function of increasing caseloads — which are largely outside of judges’ control — but also a function of a particular style of judging. Some of the arguments against Rule 32.1 reflect an attitude toward judging that has become too common in the federal appellate courts and that should be changed.

— A judge who claims that he or she sometimes needs to go through 70 or 80 drafts of an opinion before getting every word exactly right has confused the function of a judge with the function of a legislator. Judges are appointed not to draft statutes, but to resolve concrete disputes. What they hold is law; everything else is dicta. Lower court judges understand this; they know how to read a decision and extract its holding.

— Judges could save a lot of time if they would abandon “the discursive, endless federal appellate opinion.”

[03-AP-435] Judges should write short, direct opinions that address only the one or two issues that most need substantial discussion. Instead, judges too often trudge through every issue mentioned anywhere in a brief. Judges should also spend less time obsessing over every footnote and comma.

ii. Judges also now spend too much time on drafting unpublished opinions.

— If unpublished opinions were written as judges claim — if they were two- or three-paragraph opinions that started with “the parties are familiar with the facts” and then very briefly described why the court agreed or disagreed with the major contentions — then parties would not want to cite them. But many unpublished decisions go far beyond this. They are 10 or 12 pages long, they contain a great deal of discussion of the facts, and they go on and on about the law. If an opinion looks like a duck and quacks like a duck, parties are going to want to cite it like a duck.

— It is odd to fix the problems with unpublished opinions not by fixing the problems with unpublished opinions but by barring people from talking about unpublished opinions. Judges would not need no-citation rules if they would confine themselves to issuing (1) full precedential opinions in cases that warrant such treatment or (2) two- or three-paragraph explanations in cases that do not. The problem is that judges insist on “a third, intermediate option: a full and reasoned but unprecedent[ial] appellate opinion.” [03-AP-219] Judges have only themselves to blame.

c. Third, if abolishing no-citation rules had the impact on judges’ workload that Rule 32.1’s opponents fear, then no-citation rules would not be on the wrong side of history. But they are. “The citadel of no-citation rules is falling. There is a clear trend, both in the individual federal circuits and in the states, toward abandoning those rules. Nine of the thirteen circuits now allow citation of unpublished opinions. And while a majority of the states still prohibit such citation, the margin is slim and dwindling.” [03-AP-032] As courts have uniformly gotten more busy, the trend has uniformly been toward liberalizing rules regarding the citation of unpublished opinions. Obviously even busy courts have been able to handle their caseloads despite abolishing no-citation rules.

d. Rule 32.1 would, in some respects, reduce the workload of judges, because no-citation rules require judges and litigants to treat as issues of first impression questions that have already been addressed many times by the circuit.

i. Take, for example, United States v. Rivera-Sanchez, 222 F.3d 1057, 1062-63 (9th Cir. 2000), in which the Ninth Circuit admitted that various panels had issued at least 20 unpublished opinions resolving the same unsettled issue of law at least three different ways — all before any published opinion addressed the issue. To quote Rivera-Sanchez,

“Our conclusion that this decision meets the criteria for publication was prompted by the fact that it establishes a rule of law that we had not previously announced in a published opinion. Various three-judge panels of our court, however, have issued a number of unpublished memorandum decisions taking different approaches to resolving the question whether the Supreme Court’s opinion in Almendarez-Torres v. United States, 523 U.S. 224 (1998), requires a district court faced with a defendant convicted of illegal re-entry after deportation whose indictment refers to both 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a) and 8 U.S.C. § 1326(b)(2) to resentence or merely correct the judgment of conviction. These conflicting mandates undoubtedly have created no small amount of confusion for district judges who serve in border districts. While our present circuit rules prohibit the citation of unpublished memorandum dispositions, see 9th Cir. R. 36-3, we are mindful of the fact that they are readily available in on line legal databases such as Westlaw and Lexis.

“During oral argument, we asked counsel to submit a list of the unpublished dispositions of this court that have confronted this issue. The parties produced a list of twenty separate unpublished dispositions instructing district courts to take a total of three different approaches to correct the problem. Under our rules, these unpublished memorandum dispositions have no precedential value, see 9th Cir. R. 36-3, and this opinion now reflects the law of the circuit. To avoid even the possibility that someone might rely upon them, however, we list these unpublished memorandum decisions below so that counsel and the district courts will know that each of them has been superseded today.”

ii. It is hard to know how the Ninth Circuit’s no-citation rule saved the court any time in this instance. An issue that could have been settled authoritatively on the first or second occasion instead was litigated at least 21 times. Had an attorney representing a party in, say, the sixth case been able to draw the court’s attention to its five prior decisions, it seems likely that the court would have issued a published opinion settling the issue. And attorneys likely would not have litigated the issue over and over again if the court’s rules had not required them to treat an issue that had already been addressed 20 times as an issue of first impression. No-citation rules keep issues “in play” — and thus encourage litigation — much longer than necessary.

8. Regarding the argument that Rule 32.1 would result in more one-line dispositions:

a. Opponents of Rule 32.1 have argued both (i) that one-line dispositions would be harmful because parties would not get an explanation of why they won or lost and (ii) that the explanation that many unpublished opinions give parties about why they won or lost is not accurate. What judges are arguing is that they need to be able to keep up the illusion of giving parties adequate explanations for the results of cases. This is not a compelling reason to maintain no-citation rules.

b. It would be better for courts to issue no opinion at all than an opinion that so poorly reflects the views of the judges that those judges are unwilling to have it cited back to them. If, as many judges claim, unpublished opinions accurately report only a result — and not necessarily the reason for the result — then the court should just issue a result. As one commentator wrote: “If the result of adopting the proposed rule is to force judicial staff to write less in unpublished orders, then so be it. It is better to have a one-sentence disposition written by an actual judge th[a]n three pages written by a recent law school graduate masquerading as a judge. There is no point . . . for offering an explanation of the court’s reasoning to litigants when the court itself is unwilling to be bound by that reasoning.” [03-AP-414]

9. Regarding the argument that Rule 32.1 would result in unpublished opinions being used to mislead courts — or that courts would misuse or misunderstand unpublished opinions:

a. The circuit judges who write unpublished opinions do not need this protection. Whatever the flaws of unpublished opinions, those flaws are best known to the judges who write them. It is unlikely that a court will give its own opinion “too much” weight or not understand the limitations of an opinion that it wrote.

b. Lower court judges also do not need this protection.

i. Some of the comments against Rule 32.1 take a dim view of the abilities of district court judges. Commentators suggest, for example, that no-citation rules are needed to keep district court judges from being “distracted” by citations to unpublished opinions and to prevent judges from giving those opinions too much weight.

ii. This concern is misplaced. District court judges are entrusted on a daily basis with the lives and fortunes of those who appear before them. They regularly grapple with the most complicated legal and factual issues imaginable. They are quite capable of understanding and respecting the limitations of unpublished opinions.

iii. District courts have nonbinding authorities cited to them every day. For example, a district court in Oregon may have a decision of the Ninth Circuit, a decision of the Second Circuit, a decision of the Illinois Supreme Court, and a law review article cited to it in the course of one brief. It is not terribly difficult for the district court to understand the difference between the Ninth Circuit cite and the other cites. Likewise, it will not be terribly difficult for the district court to understand the difference between a published opinion of the Ninth Circuit that it is obligated to follow and an unpublished decision that it is not.

iv. District judges have the courage to disagree with unpublished decisions that they believe are wrong. Moreover, given that numerous circuit judges have commented publicly about the poor quality of unpublished decisions, it may not even take much courage to disagree with those decisions. In several circuits, unpublished decisions can be cited to district courts, and there is no evidence that district courts have felt compelled to treat those decisions as binding for fear of provoking the appellate courts.

10. Regarding the argument that Rule 32.1 would result in attorneys having to do much more legal research and clients having to pay much higher legal bills:

a. To begin with, if no-citation rules really spared attorneys and their clients from the fate predicted by opponents of Rule 32.1, then those rules would be widely supported by the bar. They are not, at least outside of the Ninth Circuit:

i. The ABA House of Delegates declared in 2001 that no-citation rules are “contrary to the best interests of the public and the legal profession” and called upon the federal appellate courts to “permit citation to relevant unpublished opinions.”

ii. The former chair of the D.C. Circuit’s Advisory Committee on Procedures wrote: “Probably more than any other facet of appellate practice, these [no-citation] policies have drawn well-deserved criticism from the bar and from scholars. When I chaired the D.C. Circuit’s Advisory Committee on Procedures, this kind of practice was perennially and uniformly condemned — all to no avail.” [03-AP-016]

iii. Rule 32.1 is supported by such national organizations as the ABA and the American College of Trial Lawyers, by bar organizations in New York and Michigan, and by such public interest organizations as Public Citizen Litigation Group and Trial Lawyers for Public Justice.

iv. By contrast, only lawyers who clerked for or who appear before Ninth Circuit judges have complained in great number about Rule 32.1. If Rule 32.1 were likely to create the predicted problems, lawyers from throughout the United States should be rising up against it, led by such organizations as the ABA.

b. In any event, Rule 32.1 would not create serious problems for attorneys and their clients:

i. Opponents of Rule 32.1 are simply wrong in arguing that they now have no duty to research unpublished opinions, but, if those opinions could be cited, they would then have a duty to research all unpublished opinions.

ii. It is not the ability to cite unpublished opinions that triggers a duty to research them.

- If unpublished opinions contain something of value, then attorneys already have an obligation to research them — so as to be able to advise clients about the legality of their conduct, predict the outcome of litigation, and get ideas about how to frame and argue issues before the court.
- If unpublished opinions do not contain something of value, then attorneys will not have an obligation to research them even if they can be cited. No rule of professional responsibility requires attorneys to research useless materials.

iii. In researching unpublished opinions, attorneys already apply the same common sense that they apply in researching everything else. No attorney conducts research by reading every case, treatise, law review article, and other writing in existence on a particular point — and no attorney will conduct research that way if unpublished opinions can be cited. If a point is well-covered by published opinions, an attorney will not read unpublished opinions at all. But if a point is not addressed in any published opinion, an attorney will look at unpublished opinions, as he or she should.

11. Several of those who commented in favor of Rule 32.1 made clear that they were doing so only because they view it as a valuable “first step.” These commentators argued that the practice of issuing unpublished decisions should be abolished and criticized the Committee for “legitimizing” or “tacitly endorsing” the practice in Rule 32.1. At the same time, at least one judge said that he did not object to Rule 32.1, but that he wanted to put the Committee on notice that he would strongly oppose any future rule requiring that unpublished opinions be treated as precedential.

b. Summary of Arguments Regarding Form

Not surprisingly, the comments that we received about Rule 32.1 focused on the substance, not on the drafting. Most of the remarks about the drafting were off-hand, such as the occasional comment that Rule 32.1 was “clear” or “well drafted.” The commentators did not seem to have any trouble understanding the rule.

The only confusion about the meaning of the rule that appeared with any frequency in the comments was the assumption that the rule would require courts to treat unpublished opinions as binding precedent. (I am not referring to the commentators who explained why they thought Rule 32.1 would do so de facto; I am referring only to those who seemed to assume that it would do so de jure.) It is difficult to know how much confusion exists on this point, as the commentators used the word “precedent” loosely. Some used it to mean binding precedent; others used it to mean merely non-binding guidance; and still others were not clear about how they were using it. In any event, I do not believe that this confusion can be traced to the drafting of either the rule or the Committee Note. Rather, I suspect that, to the extent that there was confusion on the point, it was confined to commentators who had heard about the rule but had not read it themselves.

Several commentators — in reference to the sentence in the Committee Note about the “conflicting” local rules of the courts of appeals — pointed out that the rules do not “conflict,” in the sense of demanding inconsistent conduct from any person, because each circuit’s rule applies only to that circuit’s unpublished opinions.

Only three commentators — all supporters of Rule 32.1 — suggested that it be rewritten in some respect:

Philip Allen Lacovara, Esq. (03-AP-016) supports Rule 32.1, but recommends a couple of changes:

1. Mr. Lacovara objects that, by referring to dispositions that have been “designated as . . . ‘non-precedential,’” Rule 32.1(a) “necessarily implies that such designations have legal force and effect” — something Mr. Lacovara disputes. So as to avoid “legitimizing” the attempts by judges to label some of their opinions “non-precedential,” Rule 32.1(a) should end with the word “dispositions”: “No prohibition or restriction may be imposed upon the citation of judicial opinions, orders, judgments, or other written dispositions.”

2. Mr. Lacovara argues that, even if that suggestion is rejected, the Committee should eliminate the “generally imposed” clause in Rule 32.1(a). He thinks it is “ludicrous” for the Committee to approve a proposed rule “that appears to license the circuits by local rule to ban all citations to all prior decisions.” He also dismisses the concern, mentioned in the Committee Note, that a circuit might promulgate a local rule requiring that copies of all unpublished opinions cited in a brief be served and filed. He believes that such a local rule is already foreclosed by Rule 32.1(b).

Prof. Stephen R. Barnett of the University of California at Berkeley School of Law (Boalt Hall) (03-AP-032) strongly supports the substance of Rule 32.1(a), but, in a recent law review article, was very critical of its drafting — and, in particular, of the decision to forego what he calls a “permissive” approach (that is, to state affirmatively that unpublished opinions may be cited) in favor of a “prohibitory” approach (that is, to bar restrictions on the citation of unpublished opinions):

1. Despite acknowledging that the text of the rule addresses only the “citation” of unpublished opinions, and despite acknowledging that the Committee Note “is at pains to make clear that [the] proposed Rule ‘says nothing whatsoever about the effect that a court must give’ to an unpublished opinion,” Prof. Barnett still believes that it is “not clear” whether Rule 32.1(a) would force courts to treat unpublished opinions as binding precedent. He argues that a local rule deeming unpublished opinions to be “non-precedential” could be seen as a “restriction” placed upon the “citation” of those opinions — and, because this “restriction” would be placed only upon unpublished opinions, it would be barred by Rule 32.1(a) as drafted. Prof. Barnett argues this problem — and others — could be avoided if Rule 32.1(a) would simply state affirmatively: “Any opinion, order, judgment, or other disposition by a federal court may be cited to or by any court.”

2. Prof. Barnett acknowledges that his alternative would not prevent courts from placing restrictions upon the citation of unpublished opinions, such as branding them as “disfavored” or providing that they can be cited only when no published opinion will serve as well. But Prof. Barnett makes three points about these restrictions (which he refers to as “discouraging words”):

- a. First, Prof. Barnett argues that it is not clear whether a local rule that disfavors the citation of unpublished opinions or that restricts the citation of unpublished opinions to situations in which adequate published opinions are lacking imposes a “restriction” upon the citation of unpublished opinions — and thus it is unclear whether Rule 32.1(a) as drafted is effective in barring such local rules. He argues that to instruct counsel that citation of unpublished opinions is “disfavored” is not necessarily to “restrict” their citation. He also points out that some restrictions on citation are worded in terms of counsel’s “belief” about the adequacy of published opinions on an issue — and that such rules are more “admonitory” than “enforceable.” He concedes, though, that some local rules do appear to impose a “restriction” on citation, and thus would be barred by Rule 32.1(a) as drafted — but not by his alternative.

- b. Second, Prof. Barnett downplays the possibility that a circuit dominated by “adamant anti-citationists . . . might impose some ‘prohibition or restriction’ that would make it difficult or impossible for attorneys to cite unpublished opinions.” In Prof. Barnett’s view, “[f]ederal circuit judges can be expected to obey the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, and to do so in spirit as well as in letter.”
- c. Finally, Prof. Barnett argues that, in any event, circuits should be able to discourage the citation of unpublished opinions and should be able to impose restrictions upon them — such as the restriction that they can be cited only when adequate published opinions are absent. Prof. Barnett repeats the familiar arguments about the lesser quality of unpublished opinions and argues that there is nothing wrong with treating them as “second-class precedents” — “as long as the[ir] citation is allowed.”

Judge Frank H. Easterbrook of the Seventh Circuit (03-AP-367) supports the rule, but generally agrees with Prof. Barnett’s comments about drafting. He also singles out for criticism the following sentence in the Committee Note: “At the same time, Rule 32.1(a) does not prevent courts from imposing restrictions as to form upon the citation of all judicial opinions (such as a rule requiring that case names appear in italics or a rule requiring parties to follow The Bluebook in citing judicial opinions.”) Judge Easterbrook points out that Rule 32(e) does bar circuits from imposing typeface or other requirements, and thus the Committee Note to Rule 32.1 should not imply that circuits retain this authority.

The Style Subcommittee (04-AP-A) makes the following suggestions:

1. Change the heading from “Citation of Judicial Dispositions” to “Citing Judicial Dispositions.”

2. In subdivision (a), change “upon the citation of” to “on citing” both places where the phrase occurs.

3. In subdivision (b), change “A party who cites” to “If a party cites,” insert a comma after “database,” insert “the party” before “must file,” and delete “other written.”

c. List of Commentators

i. Commentators Who Oppose Proposed Rule

Federal Circuit Court Judges

First Circuit

Chief Judge Michael Boudin (03-AP-192) (did not expressly oppose Rule 32.1, but said that almost all of the First Circuit’s judges believe that restricting citation to situations in which no published opinion adequately addresses the issue is “a reasonable local limitation”)

Second Circuit

Chief Judge John M. Walker, Jr. (03-AP-329) (on behalf of himself and 18 active and senior judges on the Second Circuit) (Chief Judge Walker testified at 4/13 hearing)

Third Circuit

Senior Judge Ruggero J. Aldisert (03-AP-293)

Fourth Circuit

Judge M. Blane Michael (03-AP-401)

Fifth Circuit

Senior Judge Thomas M. Reavley (03-AP-170)

Sixth Circuit

Judge Boyce F. Martin, Jr. (03-AP-269)

Seventh Circuit

Judges John L. Coffey, Richard D. Cudahy, Terence Evans, Michael S. Kanne, Daniel A. Manion, Richard A. Posner, Ilana Diamond Rovner, Diane P. Wood, and Ann Claire Williams (03-AP-396) (joint letter) (Judge Wood testified at 4/13 hearing)

Eighth Circuit

Senior Judge Myron H. Bright (03-AP-047) (Judge Bright testified at 4/13 hearing)

Chief Judge James B. Loken (03-AP-499) (reporting that 7 of 9 active judges and 3 of 4 senior judges expressing a view on Rule 32.1 opposed it)

Ninth Circuit

Senior Judge Arthur L. Alarcón (03-AP-290)

Judge Carlos Tiburcio Bea (03-AP-130)

Senior Judge Robert R. Beezer (03-AP-292)

Judge Marsha S. Berzon (03-AP-134)
